This HART, consisting of undergraduate students from Economics, Political Science, and History, collaborated on a project to archive the advocacy efforts of the Texas Slave Descendant’s Society (TSDS) and its chairman, Reginald Moore. The team created an online archive which catalogs the history of the organization’s activism and efforts impacting the community. The archive is housed at the Woodson Research Center in Rice University’s Fondren Library. The archive serves as a resource for the future work of TSDS, students, city governments, researchers and anyone interested in local and state history. In addition, the team created an online exhibit that references documents from the archive and provides information about convict leasing in Sugar Land to the general public. The online exhibit provides a basic introduction to convict leasing including its history and significance and includes specific information on convict leasing in Sugar Land, TX. The exhibit highlights the work TSDS has done to create awareness and appropriate commemoration for the role convict leasing played in the history of Sugar Land.
